

Symposium on Structural Design of Buildings in Era of off-site Prefabrication

Organised by
Department of Civil Engineering, The University of Hong Kong
Supported by
American Society of Civil Engineers (Great China Section)
Structural Division, Hong Kong Institution of Engineers
Hong Kong Institute of Steel Construction

Manufacturing parts and components of a building off-site is the current trend dominating building construction employing emerging technologies. Innovations in this theme are motivated by the sustainability merits and costs reduction. There are many facets of contemporary building technology where prefabrication and modular construction is the underlying theme. This one-day symposium is specifically targeted at the needs of engineers who are engaged in the structural design of buildings. Key concepts relevant to modularisation, structural design, and offsite manufacturing are introduced and illustrated by case studies. As design considerations and methods of construction are intertwined, both topics are covered by the speakers. The contingent of speakers is made up of experts from within prestigious institutions from within Hong Kong and from The University of Melbourne who is the leading university in Australia and has been receiving R & D funding from Australian governments and industry over many years to develop new building technologies in the prefabrication and modularisation theme. Every speaker is internationally renowned researchers and professional leader in their own right as shown below.

WHO SHOULD ATTEND: This course is suitable for civil and structural engineers working at different levels from graduate engineers to supervising senior / chief engineers, checkers, regulators and code drafters who want to acquire a sound fundamental understanding of the key principles on this subject in order to effectively exercise their respective professional duties that are associated with the engineering of structures.
